I object very strongly to this despoliation of one of the most important historical and heritage sites in scotland. It is proposed to build not low cost housing but bijou des res opposite a major visitor attraction and the former home of perhaps Scotland's most famous author. This planned estate will ruin a tranquil view which attracts many thousands of visitors who enjoy quiet walks through Scott's beautifully planned and laid out policies. The suggestion that a thin belt of trees will ameliorate the adverse visual impact is, I believe, nonsensical, apart from the years it will take for the trees to offer even a modicum of cover. In this year of remembrance for Scott should we not consider his memory and legacy with rather more care and reverence than providing the opportunity for builders to make handsome profits?
